Truck ... Continued from page A1 to be the cost of fixing the night scan unit." In the meantime, Holcomb said the 1-year-old truck is in service and has never been taken out of service from this incident. Although the night scan light on top of the truck is missing, the truck still has operating side lights and there are portable lights firefighters can use if called out at night. Hopefully, the department will be able to install the new air conditioning units and lights without having to send the truck to Wisconsin for the repairs, said Holcomb. Mosul ... Continued from page A1 Thorp would not elaborate on the size of the U.S. presence in Mosul, Iraq's third-largest city, with a population of more than 600,000. He also said he did not know how large the 5th Corps was. Just a day earlier, the key northern oil city of Kirkuk also fell with barely a fight. U.S. commanders said Iraqi forces might be planning a last stand in Saddam Hussein's birthplace of Tikrit, the last major population center still in Iraqi hands. Coalition warplanes have been pounding Iraqi forces around Tikrit. As the Iraqis abandoned Mosul, U.S.-backed Kurdish forces reached the outskirts of the city and set up checkpoints leading into the town center. Abu Dhabi TV showed pictures of the looting of the Central Bank branch. Bills littered the street. One person had what appeared to be stacks of bound packages of Iraqi dinars stuffed under his T-shirt. Gunmen, apparently Kurdish fighters, arrived at the bank and started swinging their rifles and firing into the air to force looters to leave. "What is happening shouldn't happen," said one man. "This is barbaric. This is not Saddam's money. This is the nation's and the people's money." On the square in front of the Govern-

Kniesly ...

Continued from page A1 71 years old and not in the best of health. I'm being sentenced for a crime I did not commit."

He spoke of his unblemished record while employed 29 years with the Post Office as well as his involvement in his church, Calvary Presbyterian, and the lives of his children, grandchildren and great-grandchild.

In addition to the more than 60 letters written on Kniesly's behalf, friend and neighbor Donald Heckard and friend Thao (Tracy) Nguyen testified to the support Kniesly has shown to them and their families over the years.

Nguyen spoke of how the Knieslys sponsored a Vietnamese family, her family, to come to the United States in 1979 and reside. She said they helped her family adjust to the American culture and introduced them to many things. "Dan was my first Santa Claus," she said. "He was there when my dad graduated from Ivy Tech. He was there when my mom opened her first small business ..."

That support also was shown to neighbors as Kniesly would often raise money for funeral flowers when there was a death in the neighborhood, Heckard told the judge. He also spoke of Kniesly's contributions to his church and service on the various boards at Calvary Presbyterian.

And while Brugh made reference to several mitigating factors for a shortened sentence, Deputy Prosecutor Lisa Swaim pressed for an aggravated sentence as she pointed out the violence of the attack and Baghdad ...

Continued from page A1 He suggested the lawlessness will ease with the rebuilding of the civil authority. "We have to be patient over that," Brooks said. "We are not exercising the same kind of grip over the population that the regime did. That's by design."

U.S. commander Gen. Tommy Franks issued new rules of behavior today for American forces in Baghdad now that the Iraqi capital is under U.S. control.

Under the rules, troops are forbidden to use deadly force to prevent looting. They should allow government workers to go to their jobs. Hospitals, businesses and mosques should remain open. Schools should reopen and record attendance.

Meanwhile, scattered bursts of machine-gun fire could be heard around the city in a reminder that the fighting is not yet over. U.S. troops worked to hold key intersections against Iraqi holdouts and manned checkpoints, on high alert against suicide attacks. "I feel like I'm in Beirut, Lebanon, waiting for the suicide bombers," said Army Lt. Col. Philip DeCamp. "We know they're holed up on the other side of the river and scattered around the city." Today, a car carrying an Iraqi family drove through a checkpoint in Baghdad without stopping, and Marines opened fire. Three adults were killed, and a 5-year-old girl was wounded. On Thursday night, a man strapped with explosives blew himself up at a checkpoint near the Saddam City section of Baghdad. Four Marines were seriously wounded. A short time later, a man started walking toward U.S. soldiers stationed at an intersection near the government's tourism department. The soldiers, on edge against the possibility of a suicide attack, fired four warning shots, but the man kept coming. They opened fire. When they found his body in the morning, he was unarmed. In the Al-Mansour district in western Baghdad, pro-Saddam bands of Arab volunteers manned sandbagged positions, armed with rocket-propelled grenades and Kalashnikov rifles. Residents said they were mostly Syrians.

unchallenged through the streets of the city of 100,000, looters emptied government buildings down to the bathroom fixtures and statues of Saddam lay broken in the dust. The capture of Kirkuk left Iraq's No. 2 oil region almost fully intact. Coalition leaders had feared retreating Iraqi forces might set the fields ablaze, but only one well fire raged near Kirkuk. The United States had asked Kurdish forces not to enter Kirkuk for fear of alarming Turkey. But when the Kurds went in anyway, U.S. special operations forces were sent in to accompany them and were soon joined by elements of the Army's 173rd Airborne Brigade, which parachuted into northern Iraq weeks ago, the Pentagon said. The Turks fear that Iraq's Kurds will set up an independent state and fire up separatist sentiment among Kurds living in Turkey. Secretary of State Colin Powell said he promised Turkey the Kurds would pull out and be replaced by U.S. troops. Jalal Talabani, leader of one of the factions whose forces entered the city, told Turkish television that all Kurdish fighters would leave by the end of Friday. Turkish Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul said his country has U.S. approval to send military observers to Kirkuk to make sure the Kurdish fighters keep their word.
