WASHINGTON, D.C. (AP) - A spe-cial federal commission said Sunday an all-volunteer military force still is "far could help avert insufficient recruits, but went on to stress that a key weakness in the present military picture is a lack of readiness in the Army National Guard and Reserve and the Naval Resérve for quick deployment.

The commission told President Ford and Congress that prospects for sustaining a peacetime all-volunteer force over the next 10 years "will be determined basically by the economic situation."

If a booming economy develops, it said, "the supply of recruits will probably not be large enough to support needs of the services under current policies and programs."

The commission said recruiting shortfails could be averted by pay raises, more enlistment bonuses and increased enrollment of women. It stressed pay and benefits must be competitive with those for civilians.

The seven-member commission was created by Congress to study the entire complex defense manpower structure and propose necessary changes. It called its 518-page report "a road map to follow over the next decade."

While saying the regular armed services have been generally successful in preparing for their post-Vietnam missions, the commission called the reserve units' lack of readiness a key weakness.

Tarr said in an interview "the total force is not a reality yet, mainly because we can't rely on the National Guard and Reserve to fulfill their responsibilities under the contingency plans."

Tarr blamed problems in reserve recruiting, training and equipment for this situation.

"Recognizing that the all-volunteer force was defined as a smaller ... active force supported by strengthened reserve components, one must question whether the total force policy is a truly viable concept," the commission said.

The commission showed concern about Ford's moves dismantling the draft machinery, saying it feared the dismantling would cause the pool of trained individual reservists to dry up and that many Guard and Reserve units could not be ready for deploy-ment overseas 30 to 90 days after callup.

Defense planners believe a U.S. buildup in Europe must be completed within that time frame in the event of a massive Soviet attack upon NATO. Otherwise, planners believe, the war could be lost.

But the commission said the Nation-from a reality." It urged revival of standby draft machinery and annual registration to avoid serious manpower shortages in a sudden war. Clipping a two-year study, the Defense Manpower Commis-sion, headed by Curtis Tarr, added that pay al Guard and Reserve probably would take from 120 to 180 days to get ready for shipment overseas.

"In the event of sudden major hostilities, our volunteer forces would be weakend by casualties without adequate loss replacements, in time would be unable to conduct sustained operations, and could be annihilated."
